OTA & Travel Distribution Update: Expedia's recent second-quarter earnings release reflects current travel industry misery; Expedia's failure to provide refunds allegedly violates Washington state's Consumer Protection Act

This week's Update takes a deep dive into all things Expedia, and includes several stories regarding Expedia's recent disastrous quarterly earnings release, an actual copy of the release as well as a copy of a complaint recently filed in Washington state against Expedia that raises some interesting questions for Expedia and other travel intermediaries. Enjoy.

Expedia's Recent Quarterly Earnings Release Reflects Current Travel Industry Misery

("Abysmal April pulls Expedia Group down to record lows in second quarter," Jul 31, 2020 via PhocusWire)

Where to start...Here are my key takeaways from Expedia's second-quarter earnings report:

- "Worst quarter the travel industry has seen in modern history." Peter Kern, Expedia CEO
- 82 percent decline year over year in overall revenue ($3.2 billion to $566 million), with lodging revenue declining 78 percent
- 90 percent decline year over year in gross bookings
- 91 percent decline year over year in media and advertising revenues (Trivago and Expedia Group Media Solutions)
- Company-wide selling and marketing expenses in the second quarter dropped from $1.6 billion to $296 million
- April was the low point (cancellations exceeding bookings), but May and June have seen modest increases in bookings (and cancellations have stabilized).
- Drive-to destinations are the first to return
- Vrbo has become Expedia Group's pandemic bright spot with daily rates continuing to increase (yes, increase) and the overwhelming majority (experts speculate as high as 83 percent) of bookings coming through organic (less expensive) sources. Dare we say that Vrbo is engaged in its own form of direct booking program...

- Although Expedia's $275 million industry recovery program has been rolled out to partners in 80 countries, no information was given on the number of partners that have actually enrolled in the program and/or how much of the $275 million has actually been distributed.

Class Action Complaint Alleges Violations of State Consumer Protection Act for Expedia's Refusal to Secure Traveler Refunds

Recently, a passenger on a canceled July 2020 flight to Italy on TAP Air Portugal filed a class action complaint against Expedia asserting, among other things, that (a) the passenger had booked his flight with Expedia, not the airline, (b) the passenger's primary relationship was with Expedia, not with the airline, and (c) Expedia's refusal to ensure that the passenger received a refund for the canceled flight (as opposed to the voucher that was offered) constituted unfair and deceptive conduct in violation of Washington state's Consumer Protection Act. Although there are enumerable issues with the complaint and its many assertions, it will be interesting to see how quickly Expedia can dismiss the complaint and whether similar class action claims will be made against other agents, tour operators and/or intermediaries over suppliers' failures to provide refunds. Time to check those booking terms and conditions...

How a Pandemic Helped Expedia's Vrbo Fix Its Google Problem

Jul 31, 2020 via Skift (subscription may be required)

What a difference seven months and a global pandemic make. If you recall, Expedia Group forced out CEO Mark Okerstrom last December, in part, because the company hadn't adapted to Google capturing a bunch of its lodging traffic. OK, you can debate whether a revenue decline in Expedia Group's Hotels, Media and Platform business in the third quarter of 2019 could truly be laid at Google's doorstep or whether much of the issue was Expedia's lack of execution.

Airbnb Sets Up Clash With Expedia Over Number of Legal Rentals in San Diego

Google Made Advertising Concessions to Travel Partners But They're Still Angry

Jul 24, 2020 via Skift Travel News (subscription may be required)

As the pandemic brought travel to a standstill in the first quarter and bookings were cancelled en masse, advertisers spent millions of dollars on Google advertising that turned into nothing. Since then, Google made concessions to some advertisers — but they scoff at the paltry amount.

Short-term Rentals and Misalignment of the Marketplace

Jul 29, 2020 via Phocus Wire

The distribution landscape for short-term vacation rentals is dominated by marketplaces. However, the pandemic has revealed some weak points and misalignment of incentives within the traditional marketplace model.
