

Comebacks, Courts & Collabs: A Wild Week in Sports & Entertainment

05.09.25 01.07.26

Welcome back to the Spotlight! While I appreciate your valiant efforts in coming back to this space, that comeback pales in comparison to the two comebacks the underdog New York Knicks have had against the defending NBA Champion Boston Celtics - somehow clawing back from 20 point deficits in consecutive games to seize a 2-0 lead in the 2nd round of the NBA Playoffs. The games have been nothing short of captivating, yet immensely trying. What started out with questions in my mind about how the Knicks could possibly survive this series has been replaced by questions about whether I can survive the ups and downs of this series. Regardless, these NBA Playoffs have provided some of the most compelling moments in recent memory-the TV ratings have certainly backed up that assertion. So, for all the concerns about who will be the stewards of the league now that LeBron James is reaching the end of his career, it's clear that the present and the future are bright as ever, with chances for athletes to build their own brands and author their own success stories. Speaking of comebacks, I'll be out recharging next week but will return the week of 5/19-hopefully you will do the same.

- Country music star Chris Stapleton's Tennessee whiskey brand, "Traveller" becomes the first official whiskey of Major League Baseball. Given the name, it's unlikely that the NBA will follow suit.
- Nine-time NBA All-Star guard Russell Westbrook comes aboard as a founder of Eazewell, a startup company that uses artificial intelligence to ease grieving loved ones' burdens with funeral planning. Humanity will have dodged a bullet if artificial intelligence sticks only to that sense of the words "funeral planning..."
- Rihanna's multibillion dollar beauty brand Fenty Beauty, becomes the latest such brand to secure sponsorship in the WNBA, partnering with the defending WNBA Champions New York Liberty. As part of the sponsorship, the brand's logos will be included on the team's pregame warm-up apparel, while other in-game activations are contemplated. No word on whether the team will be creating a co-branded umbrella...ella...ella
